Not illustrated. 1813 Excerpt: .They were pruned of every unnecessary epithet, in order that its luxuriance being repressed, the language might become more vigorous and expressive. The character of his style was exquisitely wrought and polished up to the perfection Of ideal beauty. It were no wonder, therefore, if we scarcely discern the lineaments of a family resemblance in the works which we purpose to compare with Junius, allowing they were all the acknowledged productions of the same mind. There is another reason why the author, whoever he were, would, as far as possible, remove all resemblance between the style of Junius and his other works. He would justly fear that the internal evidence which all compositions, by the same hand, afford of their common origin, especially to those who are accustomed to regard the nicer distinctions in phraseology, would be r an obvious means of discovering that secret, on...
